The Last Epoch
in the History of the World

Who will reign?

12A. Which reign forms the last epoch in the history of the world?

Patriciate – Holy Roman Empire

“Patricianship, the quality of belonging to a patriciate, began in the ancient world, where cities such as Ancient Rome had a social class of patrician families, whose members were initially the only people allowed to exercise many political functions. In the rise of European towns in the 12th and 13th century, the patriciate, a limited group of families with a special constitutional position, was the motive force.

In 19th century Central Europe, the term had become synonymous with the upper Bourgeoisie and cannot be interchanged with the medieval patriciate in Central Europe. In German-speaking parts of Europe as well as in the maritime republics of the Italian Peninsula, the patricians were as a matter of fact the ruling body of the medieval towns. Particularly in Italy, they were part of the nobility. Members of a patrician society entered into oaths of loyalty to one another and directly with respect to the Holy Roman Emperor.”

....The Holy Roman Empire was located in western and central Europe and included parts of what is now France, Germany, and Italy....It was generally ruled by a German-speaking Emperor.”

“Roman society was divided into two classes, the patricians and the plebeians; three if you count slaves, which you obviously should, although they were less active politically than the other two classes. The patricians were large landowners, in an era where the source of economic power was land. What's more, while much of Italy was in theory public land, in practice, patricians could farm those lands and keep the proceeds as if it was their own property. The fact that the patricians could rely on slave labor to farm this land made it even more profitable for them, even as it squeezed the plebeians out of the jobs they might have had farming. This fundamental equality between a landowning patrician class and the economically insecure plebeians is the most important thing to keep in mind about the history of the late Roman Republic.”

12B. Which reign forms the last epoch in the history of the world?

Patriciate – America now looks like Rome before the fall of the Roman Republic

...What about the political system? As it is well known, Rome was run by a Senate, but the Senate was actually made up of patricians....In the late second century BC — decades before Caesar actually rolled around — this crushing inequality gave birth to a political crisis. Two brothers, Tiberius and Gaius Gracchus, tried to implement various reforms to rebalance the inequality, including redistributing land and distributing grain to the Roman poor.... But they failed....

...Because those conflicts were so deeply entrenched, Rome kept lurching from social to political to constitutional crisis year after year, decade after decade, so that by the time a popular strongman came along, the Republic was like a ripe fruit waiting to be plucked....

...All of which bring us to our current situation in the USA. Have you noticed that millions have left the labor force? That people without college degrees are increasingly locked out of the economy? That the globalized, meritocratic system rewards a small elite while leaving everybody else behind?

The parallels are there, are they not? There may not be grain riots, or large landholds, but there is definitely a patrician class, and a plebeian class, and they are definitely at loggerheads. And the inability of the political and economic system to deliver an outcome that leaves both classes doing well, keeps intensifying the conflict...Let us hope we see some genuinely Gracchian reforms, and let us hope they work this time. Because if not, our children will one day see a Caesar cross the Potomac river and sit in Capitol Hill.”

Another kind of Patriciate: Elimination of the Middle Class – Socialism

- “Socialism has little regard for the middle class. It is all about securing and maintaining power for the ruling class [patriciate]. Consider the People’s Republic of China [PRC]. Mired in Maoist revolutionary rhetoric, it was one of the world’s poorest countries for its first three decades. Then, Deng Xiaoping introduced “socialism with Chinese characteristics.” Forty years later, the PRC boasts the world’s second largest economy, but its citizens remain deprived of basic human rights and civil liberties. The Communist Party does not allow a free press or free speech, competitive elections, an independent judiciary, free travel or a representative parliament.” <https://www.heritage.org/progressivism/commentary/the-truth-about-socialism-it-doesnt-care-about-the-middle-class-its-about>

The First Republic – [Papal Supremacy I]
