Outbreak of methemoglobinemia in a hospital in Japan

A chemical incident occurred because of a cross-connection in a building. On October 19, 2021, methemoglobinemia developed in 10 of 17 infants in the neonatal intensive care unit of Gunma University Hospital, Maebashi, Gunma, Japan.

It was found that these infants had been fed milk that had been prepared in the kitchen on the first floor of the same hospital building, and it was suspected that the event was caused by nitrite in the water used to prepare the milk. Treatment was immediately initiated, and fortunately, the incident did not become more serious, but normal operations of the hospital had to be suspended because water was supposedly contaminated.

In methemoglobinemia, the hemoglobin in red blood cells changes to abnormal methemoglobin, causing the skin and mucous membranes to turn blue. It is also called a blue baby syndrome because the whole body turns blue. These symptoms are caused by the ingestion of nitrite or nitrate. Many cases of methemoglobinemia have been reported worldwide for a long time, mainly in European countries and the United States.
