X. Published Notice

“Water supply facilities that supply water to more than 100 residents or supply more than 20 m³ [20 meter cubic] of water per day are called specified privately owned water supply systems (SPOWs)

In this case, because the infant’s symptoms of poisoning by nitrous acid were acute and obvious, the provision of milk was stopped immediately, treatment was initiated, and the cause was immediately treated properly. In general, the plumbing in hospitals, hot springs, and lodging buildings is often complex, but no other pipes should ever be connected to the water supply system for drinking. The management of circulating water in the hot water system, including from the perspective of Legionella control, will require further attention in the future. In addition to aging, expanding, and remodeling of buildings, buildings are affected by summer and winter air- conditioning piping system changes and pressure fluctuations. It may be difficult to continuously secure appropriate personnel who are familiar with the facility and its structure due to personnel transfers, contract changes, etc. If warm or smelly water comes out of the cold water faucet or if the continuous monitoring of dialysis machines shows abnormalities, changes in the water quality may be present. Additionally, in areas where pesticides and fertilizers are used or groundwater is contaminated, nitric and nitrous acid concentrations may be high to begin with, requiring careful water quality control even when there is no piping error. The SPOWs that use groundwater do not have a wide-area backup system with a distribution pipe network or spare pipes and pumps, making it difficult to respond in the event of an earthquake, plumbing accident, or accidental water contamination. Routine cooperation with local waterworks and neighboring institutions is required. We hope that this paper will be of interest to public health sector personnel and engineers.

XI. Conclusions

In SPOWs, incidents such as cross-connections, aging facilities, and accidental water contamination are likely to occur. Recent accident cases are summarized. As for the outbreak of methemoglobinemia at the University Hospital, it was caused by the backflow of nitrite in the anticorrosion agent in the water for air conditioning due to cross-connection. Hydraulic calculations also showed that backflow can occur from air-conditioning water. We must be extremely careful about the inadequate piping in facilities, especially those related to medical care.”

Note: Causes of Blue Baby Syndrome

Region	Primary Causes	Incidence Rate & Trends	Infrastructure & Regulations
Africa	Nitrate-heavy agricultural runoff, untreated sewage, and poorly managed rural well water.	High risk in localized areas ; driven by rapid urbanization and infrastructure deficits.	Limited tap-water filtration in rural/informal settlements. Major initiatives aim to improve maternal-infant health tracking.
USA	Private, untested rural wells impacted by industrial fertilizer runoff.	Extremely rare in urban areas; isolated entirely to rural communities.	Regulated public municipal water utilities. The EPA strictly caps municipal nitrate limits at 10 mg/L .
Japan	Predominantly genetic variants rather than environmental toxins.	Virtually zero environmental cases ; cases are isolated to ultra-rare hereditary conditions.	Highly stringent nationwide water quality monitoring. Medical cases are usually genetic (e.g., CYB5R3 gene mutations).
